Stopping the Spread of Disinformation: We're in This Together

In social media posts and comments, in emails and in texts, false information surrounds us every day. Misinformation is false information, but it is not created or shared with the intention of causing harm. However, disinformation is false information that is deliberately created to mislead, harm, divide or manipulate us.

Disinformation, often created by foreign adversaries, is especially harmful during an election year because it is made to divide us and take away confidence in our elections processes. No matter who we support politically, the spread of disinformation surrounding our elections should concern us all as it threatens to undermine our democratic processes.

The good news is that each of us can help stop the spread of disinformation. We can learn how to spot disinformation. We can share facts instead of disinformation. We can also talk about disinformation with our communities and the people we care about. People are likely to change their behavior when their fellow citizens reach out to them using positive messaging, without scolding or belittling.

We all have a part to play in protecting American elections from disinformation. We are all in this together.

The spread of disinformation hurts our democracy because it erodes trust.

Foreign adversaries hope to disrupt our democracy. They use multiple fake accounts and social media “bots,” which are automated programs that simulate human behavior. These foreign influence campaigns often build their audiences on social media platforms by joining groups and sharing non-controversial content. Eventually, they will start sharing disinformation, elevating divisive, extreme and controversial opinions to create division.

Foreign adversaries want to deceive Americans and create chaos.

Foreign adversaries use social media to initiate chaos and to try to make disinformation appear legitimate. They may have their own online platforms and spend a lot of money to appear genuine, but their only goal is to spread propaganda to further their own interests. Per U.S. law, foreign actors engaged in political activities must disclose their relationship to foreign governments; disinformation websites may not have that disclosure.

We perform a civic duty when we investigate content before sharing it.

Think before you share. If you read something online that seems questionable, take time to understand and verify it. Search for other reliable sources to verify information before sharing online content, especially if it is controversial or emotionally charged.

Foreign adversaries try to divide us by playing on our emotions.

Pause before sharing a link, email or other message. Why are you sharing this? Disinformation is created to make you upset or shocked! Sometimes, the best way to stop disinformation is to choose not to share it.

A unified effort to confront disinformation can build bridges and serve all of us.

Talk with your friends and family about disinformation. By sharing the facts, verifying trusted sources and spotting disinformation, you can help stop the spread. You should not engage with every piece of disinformation, but if you are really concerned, you can speak out.
